Exams leaks are a threat to Morocco's education system

Morocco's Ministry of Education discovered that its Baccalaureate exams had been "leaked" on social networks just a few hours before the exams were to be administered last Wednesday. At the same time, media received a copy of the mathematics exam, which turned out to be the same exam that was posted online. The Ministry of Education has announced its decision to retest all students in the experimental and technological sciences department who took the mathematics exam.

Pedagogical researchers affirmed that as the exams were leaked, "educational and national efforts were ineffective and failed to achieve the ultimate goals. Thus, we moved one step backward instead of forward, because of the unplanned and improvised policies and measures associated with the preparation and implementation of this exam."

The leak of the mathematics exam hours before it was to take place is a serious indicator of the weak moral standards in our society. Thus, the Ministry of Education must investigate, in collaboration with the police, those responsible for this scandal and bring them to justice. Those who leaked the exam do not want the best for our students or our society. Instead, they want to implant collapsed educational values in our students and future. Some parties promote Machiavelli's quote, "the end justifies the means," by consecrating inertia in society. The fake results that our students get because of the exam leak will bring to life generations that would follow the same path. Further, fraud and forgery will become a normal and legitimate social behavior as this phenomenon grows, and will produce a weak and dependent generation, who make no effort to succeed, who wait instead for someone to easily and unethically achieve success.
