Read the text carefully then do the activities:

Last Wednesday, Microsoft Company launched a web site to stop people from pirating or using pirated versions of its software. The company also revealed that it has filed 20 more lawsuits against people it claims are dealing counterfeit or pirated software.

The new website provides information for how customers can tell whether software is genuine or not. It shows examples of suspicious packaging and other clues that can help alert users of they possess the real deal or fake copy of windows or other Microsoft software.

"Lawsuits were filed against alleged counterfeiters in several states", Microsoft said. The company has been systematically investigating and filing lawsuits over the past two years against individuals and companies that are illegally counterfeiting or pirating versions of its software.

Wednesday's moves are part of Microsoft's Genuine Software Initiative (GSI), which the company launched in July 2005 to prevent pirated counterfeited versions of Microsoft software being sold to users. According to some analyst reports, software companies lose billions of dollars every year to software pirates.

People have mixed views of Microsoft's efforts to prevent software pirating and counterfeiting. Some feel that the company's investigative measures are intrusive, such as windows genuine advantage, an automated program that checks users' PCs automatically through windows to see if they are running a genuine version of the software. Others say Microsoft is merely protecting its business interests by down on software piracy.
