It's every business-owners nightmare — one of your employees is stealing money from you. You never think it's going to happen to you — especially in a small company, where you think that you're treating your employees like your family. But, it happens more than you think. Employee theft and embezzlement can ruin an entrepreneur or small business owner. According to the 2008 Report to the Nation from the Association of Certified Fraud Examiners, U.S. businesses lose 7% of their annual revenues to fraud. That translates to approximately $994 billion in fraud losses. Small businesses are especially vulnerable.

The most common things to look out for: employees living beyond their apparent means or experiencing financial difficulties at the time of the frauds. What does this mean in today's economy where so many people may be facing financial difficulties? Even more reason to be vigilant!

Jay Myers learned his lesson the hard way. In 2003, Jay Myers was the founder of a successful Memphis-based video-conferencing firm Interactive Solutions, Inc. He had 16 employees and sales of over $5 million. He had made the Inc. list of fastest growing companies in the country and business was going well. But, personally, he was recovering from a crisis — his beloved older brother, who had been a mentor to him (and headed up the Memphis Better Business Bureau, ironically!) had died very unexpectedly. Myers took his eyes off the ball for a bit. By the time he woke up, he realized that his bookkeeper had embezzled over $250,000. How did it happen? He did a lot of the right things, but missed a few key checks and balances. He also was a little less careful and more trusting when he was getting over the loss of his brother — he thought that his employees were looking out for him. The good news is that the bookkeeper ended up in jail, he got a portion of the money back and he maintained the loyalty and support of his other employees. But, he was still out a lot of money and it did a lot to affect his trust
